The importance of modern reproducibility is enfolded in the idea that “chic is a form of architecture” in which the self is constructed using the same sleek, reproducible fashions. Vogue’s emphasis on the new and the modern and the chic reflects Burstein’s aesthetic of cold modernism as well as, to a certain extent Brown’s idea of glamour.

Brown exemplifies this scholarly tack by looking again at the
formalism so important to accounts of
twentieth-century aesthetics. Her analysis uses the

through her chosen
central term,
"glamour."
