Stigma is an attribute that conveys devalued stereotypes. Following Erving Goffman's early elaboration of the concept, psychological and social psychological research has considered how stigma operates at the micro-level, restricting the well-being of stigmatized individuals. More recently, sociologists have considered the macro-

Goffman S Theory Of Stigmatisation

Goffman's (1963) observation that stigma implies an unwitting, non-culpable falling foul of cultural norms, it was suggested that people with epilepsy felt different and experienced shame out of a sense of 'being imperfect' (Scambler and Hopkins, (1986)). This led to an analytic distinction between two words with different ancestries -
