Council house sales is not a new policy but it is only in the 1980s that it has become sufficiently important to merit the term 'social revolution'. The sale of over one million dwellings in six years has involved a rapid change in ownership and control of housing and significant redistribution of assets from the state to individuals.

The American welfare state was designed to address market shortcomings and do what private enterprises cannot or will not do. Unlike welfare states built on social democracy foundations it was not designed to promote a redistribution of political power from capital to labor; nor was it designed to mediate class struggle.
